Passage 1 · Soo-yun's Lunchbox

Soo-yun moved to a new school in Canada. On the first day, she opened her lunchbox at the long table. Inside was rice, kimchi, and a small egg roll. The girl next to her opened a sandwich. The boy across the table opened a small bowl of pasta. At first, Soo-yun felt shy. Her food looked very different from theirs. The girl with the sandwich leaned over and said, "What is that red thing? It smells good." Soo-yun smiled. "It is kimchi. It is from Korea." She let the girl try a small bite. The girl smiled. The boy passed her a pasta noodle to try. The next day, they all sat at the same table again. Soo-yun did not feel shy anymore. She had brought a piece of Korea to school. Her new friends had brought pieces of their cultures too. The lunch table was small, but it held the whole world.

Passage 2 · Grandpa's Korean New Year

Min-ho loved staying at Grandpa's house in Busan. Every Korean New Year, the whole family came together. Grandpa wore his bright blue hanbok. Min-ho's mother cooked tteokguk, a soup with white rice cakes. The smell was fragrant in the kitchen all morning. Grandpa said, "When you eat tteokguk on Seollal, you become one year older. This is our HERITAGE." After breakfast, the family did sebae. Min-ho bowed low to his grandparents on the floor. They smiled and gave him a small white envelope. Inside was money and a wish for the year. Min-ho's cousin from America did not know how to bow. Grandpa showed her, step by step. She tried it. Everyone clapped. "Now you know," Grandpa said. Passage 3 · The Diwali Lights Next Door

Last fall, a new family moved in next door. Their name was Patel. One evening, Ji-hoon looked out and saw their porch lit with tiny clay lamps. The whole walkway sparkled. He asked his mother what it was. "It is Diwali," she said. "It is the Indian festival of lights." The next day, Mrs. Patel knocked on the door. She held a small box of sweets. They were soft, round, and very fragrant. "We share these on Diwali," she said. "Each light is a wish for the year." Ji-hoon and his sister tried one. It was sweet but a little spicy. The next year, Ji-hoon's family hung a small string of lights on their own porch for Diwali. The Patels were surprised — and very happy. From their kitchen, they brought one more box of sweets across the street. Two cultures, one block, one warm light.

Passage 4 · One Game, Many Languages

On a Saturday in Seoul, ten children met on a small dirt field. Some were from Korea. Some were from China. Some were from Vietnam and the Philippines. Some had come from countries even farther. At first, they did not know how to talk together. Each one knew only a few words of Korean. One boy was patient. He pointed at the ball, smiled, and gave it a kick. The next girl ran after it. She passed it back. Soon they were all running, laughing, hollering across the field. They did not need many words. The game itself was the language. The smallest girl scored the final goal of the morning. The whole field cheered. Soccer was founded in England long ago, but on that little Seoul field it lived in many cultures at once. The children went home tired, dusty, and proud — friends who had not known each other an hour before.
