Passage 1 · The Mural on Maple Street

For years, the wall at the end of Maple Street was gray and bare. People walked past it every day without even looking. Then an artist named Rosa had an idea. She asked the families on the street if she could paint a mural, a giant picture, right on the wall. Almost everyone said yes. Rosa did not paint it alone. She invited the children of the neighborhood to help. First, she sketched a design with bright birds, trees, and a rising sun. Then she handed out brushes and showed everyone where to add color. Some days were hot, and some paint dripped, but no one wanted to stop. Little by little, the dull wall turned into a burst of color. When the mural was finished, the whole street came out to see it. Neighbors who had never spoken now stood together, pointing and smiling. The mural made people feel proud of their street. Rosa knew that art could do more than fill a wall. It could bring a whole neighborhood together and make a plain place feel like home.

Passage 2 · The Boy Who Drew Everywhere

Ever since he was very small, Daniel loved to draw. He drew on napkins at dinner, on the steam of the bathroom mirror, and in the margins of his notebooks at school. His teachers sometimes sighed and asked him to pay attention. But Daniel could not help it. When he looked at the world, he saw shapes and lines that he wanted to put on paper. One spring, his school held an art contest. The theme was "My City." Daniel spent two weeks on his drawing. He filled it with the busy market, the old clock tower, and the river that curved through town. He added tiny people, each one doing something different. When the judges saw his work, they were amazed by how much it showed. Daniel won first prize, but that was not the best part. The best part was hearing people say his drawing made them see their own city in a brand-new way. From then on, Daniel understood something important. An artist does not just copy what is there. An artist helps other people notice the beauty they walk past every day.

Passage 3 · Frida Kahlo, Painter of Her Own Story

Frida Kahlo was a famous painter from Mexico who lived about one hundred years ago. When she was a teenager, she was hurt in a terrible bus accident and had to stay in bed for many months. To pass the long days, she began to paint. Her family set up a special easel so she could paint while lying down, and they put a mirror above her bed. Because the mirror showed her own face, Frida often painted pictures of herself. These pictures are called self-portraits. In them, she did not hide her pain or pretend to be someone else. Instead, she painted her true feelings, sometimes adding bright flowers, animals, and colors from Mexican folk art. At first, some people did not understand her bold paintings. But over time, the whole world came to admire them. Today, Frida Kahlo's self-portraits hang in museums around the globe, and millions of people know her face. Frida showed that an artist can turn even hard times into something beautiful, and that honest art can speak to people everywhere.

Passage 4 · The Violin in the Subway

Every Friday evening, an old man named Mr. Okafor carried his violin down into the busy subway station. He found a quiet corner near the stairs, opened his case, and began to play. At first, hardly anyone noticed. Travelers rushed past, staring at their phones, eager to get home. But Mr. Okafor kept playing, his bow gliding gently across the strings. Slowly, something began to change. A tired woman stopped to listen and felt her shoulders relax. A little girl tugged her father's hand and began to sway to the music. A group of teenagers, who had been arguing, fell silent and smiled. For a few minutes, the cold gray station felt warmer, almost like a concert hall. People who had never spoken to one another shared a glance, as if to say, "Isn't this lovely?" When the song ended, a small crowd clapped. Mr. Okafor simply bowed and began another tune. He never asked for money or fame. He played because he believed that music belonged to everyone, not just to people in fancy concert halls. A single artist, he knew, could turn an ordinary evening into something people would remember.
